

Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Massachusetts representatives hold flags in Bucharest October 1, 2007, during the inauguration of a monument dedicated to the memory of the American soldiers who served in Romania during World War II. REUTERS/Mihai Barbu (ROMANIA)

An Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Massachusetts representative holds a flag in Bucharest October 1, 2007 during the inauguration of a monument dedicated to the memory of the American soldiers who served in Romania during World War II. REUTERS/Mihai Barbu (ROMANIA)

U.S. Ambassador to Romania Nicholas Taubman, left, and Cpt. John E. Bradley of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Massachusetts stand by a memorial for U.S. troops killed in Romania during WWII, shortly after it was unveiled in Bucharest, Romania, Monday Oct. 1, 2007. The 378 troops, mostly airmen, were killed while executing bombing raids on Romania's oil fields and transport infrastructure, at a time when Romania was a Nazi Germany ally. (AP Photo/Vadim Ghirda)

A war veteran of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Massachusetts looks down in Bucharest, Romania, Monday Oct. 1, 2007, as he attends a ceremony to unveil a memorial for U.S. troops killed in Romania during WWII. The 378 troops, mostly airmen, were killed while executing bombing raids on Romania's oil fields and transport infrastructure, at a time when Romania was a Nazi Germany ally. (AP Photo/Vadim Ghirda)

Members of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Massachusetts salute in Bucharest, Romania, Monday Oct. 1, 2007, during a ceremony to unveil a memorial for U.S. troops killed in Romania during WWII. The 378 troops, mostly airmen, were killed while executing bombing raids on Romania's oil fields and transport infrastructure, at a time when Romania was a Nazi Germany ally. (AP Photo/Vadim Ghirda)